Subject's extra information

After the Second World War and with the creation of the United Nations Organisation, the process of internationalisation of human rights was consolidated, which is why, today, it constitutes one of the specific branches or sectors of Public International Law. It is within this sector that the international system for the protection of women's rights has developed specifically and progressively. Although general human rights norms apply to them, specific recognition of women's rights has become necessary.

In the field of international law, this recognition has been progressive and constant. It has taken the form of the adoption of specific normative instruments aimed at achieving a higher level of protection. It is worth highlighting the action of the feminist movement which, through its struggle, has contributed in a definitive way to advancing the respect and protection of these rights.

It is appropriate to give students, future jurists, the opportunity to approach and familiarise themselves with the international system for the protection of women's rights, given the daily violation of these rights in a large part of the world, including in our immediate surroundings. The aim of this subject is, from the perspective of critical and reflective thinking, to lay the foundations of the international legal system for the protection of women's rights, based on the analysis of international legal instruments and their progressive development, as well as the soft law norms that complement them and contribute to their advancement.

Learning objectives

OBJECTIVES:

This subject will analyse the international system for the protection of women's rights that has been progressively developed within the framework of International Human Rights Law, which today constitutes a sector of Public International Law.

The current regulations that make up this system will be studied, as well as the parallel action of the feminist movement and non-governmental organisations that have contributed to its adoption. Specific attention will be paid to the most relevant soft law instruments that also deal with women's rights, such as the 2030 Agenda.

Finally, existing monitoring mechanisms to achieve effective implementation of existing standards will be analysed.

Learning outcomes:

- Mastery of specific international standards on women's rights.
- Identify the monitoring instruments established in the international sphere for the application of women's rights.
- Knowing how to apply existing protection mechanisms to specific cases.
- Incorporate new concepts linked to the field of gender studies, human rights and sustainable development.

Competences

- Apply their knowledge to their work or vocation in a professional manner and which is conveyed by means of the elaboration and defence of arguments and problem solving within an area of study.
- Ability to gather and interpret relevant data in order to make judgements that include reflection on social, scientific or ethical issues.
- Encourage analytical or critical thinking.
- Tackle problem solving.
- Identify specific regulations, assess and argue their application.
- Know how to apply existing protection mechanisms to specific cases.
- Incorporate the gender and human rights-based approach..

Subject contents

In accordance with the objectives and learning outcomes set, the content of the course is structured in the following units:

Unit 1. Analysis of international regulations on women's rights.

Unit 2. Implementation: conventional and extra-conventional mechanisms.

Unit 3. Soft law instruments: the 2030 Agenda.

Methodology

The methodology used in this subject combines the following teaching-learning strategies:

- Theoretical sessions.
- Resolution of cases.

- Reading of proposed materials as a starting point for carrying out various activities.
- Participation in complementary training activities: one of the activities will consist of participating in the "Classrooms against poverty" programme coordinated by the Development and Cooperation unit of the UdL.
- Guidance tutorials throughout the course
